ALEXANDRIA GAZETTE AND VIRGINIA ADVERTISER.

THE GAZETTE.

SATURDAY EVENING, AUGUST 31.

THEN AND Now. - In a recent visit to 'Nelson county by a friend of ours, a gentleman whose grand father was high sheriff of that county in 1825, exhibited to him the tax book for that year. Robert Rives, Sr., was assessed on upwards of three thousand acres of lands; and the tax on them was seventy-four dollars for that year, and now, said he, the tax on these lands will amount to three thousand dollars, while they are not as well cultivated and not, as productive as they were in 1826. The late. Hon. Wm. C. Rives had upwards of 900 acres and the tax was only nine dollars and some few cents. This same gentleman informed our friend that in re-assessing the lands for this year, some of them had been abated threefourths of their previous assessment. A good crop of wheat had been made, but the average production in the county would not exceed seven bushels per acre. — Charlottesville Int.

In the Duchy of Hesse, the women who beat their husbands were condemned to ride a donkey, which they held by the tail, and the husband was required to lead the donkey through the streets. This custom existed at Darmstadt as late as the middle of the 17th century, and was so often put in force, that a donkey was kept at the public expense for this sole use.-Another very old custom was to punish husbands who were too submissive to their wives. by taking off the roofs of their houses, saying ; The man who permits himself to be governed by his wife, deserves no protection against the winds and storms,". If two women fought in public, they were enclosed, each in a sentrybox, with their heads uncovered, and, placed face to face, were exposed in the Market Place for one hour. The most common punishment for quarrelsome women, was the "pierre infamante" suspended to the neck.
